1. INTRODUCTION

Trapping has been used for a long time as a means of controlling vermin such as wild dogs and foxes, both of which are predators of domestic stock. Traps are used also to catch rabbits, (both commercially and privately), for meat and skins and, to a limited extent, to control residual rabbits as part of wider control programs. No other animals should be intentionally caught in steel-jawed traps in Victoria.

This Code is designed to provide information and instruction on the use and operation of steel-jawed traps for the capture of pest animals. It includes advice on the most effective way of catching pest animals, while reducing the capture of non-target species, and minimising the suffering of trapped animals. Increasing the effectiveness of trapping means capturing the maximum number of pest animals in the minimum time, using the minimum number of traps necessary to undertake the task properly and, consequently, reducing the exposure of non-target animals to traps.

The Department of Conservation, Forests and Lands, provides a service to landholders for the control of wild dogs, and landholders can maximise the effectiveness of a trapping program by seeking this professional assistance. Poor trapping techniques may result in problem animals escaping and render them difficult to capture subsequently.

2. LEGAL CONSIDERATIONS

2.1 Vermin and Noxious Weeds Act, 1958

Rabbits, foxes, and wild dogs (including dingoes and their hybrids, feral dogs and dogs run wild) are among the animals proclaimed to be vermin in Victoria. All owners or occupiers of land, including the Crown, are obliged to destroy or suppress vermin on lands under their control.

2.2 Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1986

The Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act is designed to protect individual animals from cruel treatment by humans, whether the animal is wild or domestic, native or introduced. The need to control pest animals is recognised but the methods of control using steel-jawed traps have to comply with this Code. The penalties for inflicting cruelty on an animal are substantial.

The Act makes distinctions between large and small leghold traps and the Regulations define large leghold traps as having hinges not less than 12 cm wide and small leghold traps as having hinges less than 12 cm wide.

The Act restricts the use of large leghold traps to any land, both private and Crown land, in the areas summarised in Figure 1. Small leghold traps cannot be used on Crown land (except that which is leased or licensed as agricultural or grazing land), but may be used by the occupier or with the occupier's consent on private and leased or licensed Crown land throughout Victoria.

Small leghold traps may be used only in accordance with this Code of Practice. In the case of large leghold traps, it is a defence to a charge of cruelty if the trap was used in accordance with this Code of Practice.

2.3 WILDLIFE ACT 1975

The Wildlife Act 1975 is designed to provide a legal basis for planning the balanced conservation and use of wild animal resources, in the best long-term interests of the people of Victoria. The Act gives a degree of protection to all kinds of mammals, birds, reptiles and amphibians which are native to Australia (with the exception of mankind and the dingo) and to all deer, quail, pheasant and partridge.

The Act provides for persons who are appropriately authorised to capture or kill protected wildlife for approved reasons or purposes and using approved methods.

The use of steel-jawed leghold traps is never approved for taking protected wildlife.

3. SPRING-OPERATED STEEL-JAWED LEGHOLD TRAPS

Spring-operated, steel-jawed, leghold traps are prescribed in the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Regulations 1986, as large leghold traps and small leghold traps. In summary, large leghold traps have a span of not less than 12 cm between the hinging mechanisms of the jaws; small leghold traps have a span of less than 12 cm. All traps used are required to be standard commercial production units and must not be modified by the addition of extra springs, or teeth, or spikes, on the jaws, and must be fitted with a swivel between the trap and the holding chain.

3.1 LARGE LEGHOLD TRAPS

In Victoria, large leghold traps are used for wild dog control, although they incidentally catch significant numbers of foxes as well. People specifically trapping for foxes normally use small leghold traps.

3.1.1 Siting of Traps

Trapping may be conducted for preventive control or in response to stock losses or other problems such as spread of disease or wildlife losses attributable to wild dogs. Preventive control should be confined to or be adjacent to land where a problem from wild dogs could be reasonably expected to occur. Lines should be set along ridges or in higher, drier areas away from gullies and lush areas where there are higher concentrations of non-target species. Traps should be set only at sites where dog activity is apparent, as evidenced by dog droppings, markings or tracks.

Both wild dogs and non-target species often take the easiest path through bush, including vehicle tracks and wildlife trails. Setting traps close to, but not on, bush tracks, will reduce the chance of capturing non-target animals. Recommended lures may be used to attract wild dogs to such traps and so make them more specific for pest animals (see 3.1.2).

Traps should not be set randomly; domestic dogs should be used to assist trappers in choosing sites. Domestic dogs can locate those places where wild dogs have marked, such as the bases of trees and prominent tussocks, and so provide a higher probability of catching a wild dog.

3.1.2 Lures

Having set a trap, it is advisable to place a lure at the site. Lures have a distinctive smell that attract dogs and make traps more specific for dogs. Lures should be produced from products derived from dogs, including urine and faeces or mixtures of these products with organs from dog carcasses.

Artificial lures should not be used, as they have not been shown to be particularly effective in attracting dogs and may attract wildlife.

Traps must not be set on or adjacent to animal carcasses; this practice leads to the capture of increased proportions of native animals, particularly birds, small carnivorous mammals and goannas.

3.1.3 Securing of Traps

All traps set should be secured to a snig stick, tree, fence, or other immovable object.

Snig sticks are large sticks/small logs or other objects, to which traps are tethered. They allow some movement by captured animals and may reduce the extent of injuries.

Snig sticks should be of sufficient size to prevent captured animals dragging traps too far from the point of capture and ensure captured animals are dealt with.

3.1.4 Pressure Sticks

A "Pressure Stick" is a stick placed under the trap-plate and supported at each end by the jaws of the trap. This stick requires a certain weight on it before it will break, allowing the plate to drop and the trap to spring. The pressure stick helps prevent capture of birds, possums and other small animals. Other methods, based on the same principle are a ball of newspaper, or snowgrass, placed under the trap-plate. Pressure sticks should be used in setting all large leghold traps.

3.1.5 Stepping Sticks and Cattle Sticks

As stated above, traps should be set to the side of game trails or vehicle tracks. However, when traps can only be set on paths, stepping sticks and cattle sticks should be used to prevent the capture of non-target species.

"Stepping sticks" are sticks laid on one or both sides of a set trap. Four-footed animals generally will step over a single stick or between two sticks, thus stepping on the trap. Kangaroos, wallabies and often emus will jump over the stick/s and avoid the trap.

"Cattle sticks" consist of two branches leaning over a trap, so that taller animals such as cattle, kangaroos, wallabies and emus will step around them and avoid the trap. Dogs and smaller animals can walk under the stick where the trap is laid.

3.1.6 Trapping Notices

When using large leghold traps on Crown land where permitted by the Act, official Trapping Notices, supplied by the Department of Conservation, Forests and Lands, should be displayed prominently at all public access points to any trap lines, to alert visitors in the area to the presence of traps and reduce the risk to such persons or their pets.

3.1.7 Checking Traps

All traps set should be checked within two days of setting and at maximum intervals of two days thereafter.

Many factors influence the time taken to inspect traps set, including: type of terrain in which traps are used; length of each trap line; distance between trap lines; and prevailing weather. Numbers of traps set at any time should be restricted to levels that allow all traps to be checked at least once each two days.

3.2 SMALL LEGHOLD TRAPS

Small leghold traps should be restricted to the trapping of rabbits but they may be used for foxes where other methods of control or capture are inappropriate.

When setting traps for foxes, the general principles outlined for wild dogs (in 3.1) apply, that is, sets should be made where fox activity is apparent and all appropriate steps are taken to avoid the capture of animals other than vermin. Traps should be set individually and multiples of traps should not be set at any one site to catch one animal.

The remainder of this section relates to the use of small leghold traps for the capture of rabbits.

3.2.1. Siting of Traps

Small leghold traps are not permitted to be set on Crown land (other than Crown land that is leased or licensed for agricultural or grazing purposes) anywhere in Victoria.

On private land, all steps should be taken to avoid trapping animals other than vermin. Sets should be restricted to sites of rabbit activity, such as burrows, warrens, dunghills and runs.

3.2.2 Securing of Traps

All traps set should be securely pegged, to prevent being pulled out of the ground by a captured rabbit. This is particularly important in sandy, soft, or cracking soils, where longer pegs will be required.

3.2.3 Checking Traps

All small leghold traps set should be checked at least once a day and the number set restricted to a level that allows at least daily inspection of all sets.

4. HANDLING OF CAPTURED ANIMALS

4.1 TARGET ANIMALS

All dogs, foxes and feral cats caught in traps should be killed by shooting, before removal from traps.

Shooting should ensure instantaneous unconsciousness and death, preferably by firing a bullet or a charge of heavy shot directly into the brain from close range.

The brain of an animal is found in the upper (top) back part of the head.

It is important to fire at the correct angle to the head to ensure the projectile travels into the brain and that the brain is damaged extensively.

Remain calm and aim with care; wait for the animal to stop moving its head before taking aim. If possible, put the muzzle of the gun close to, or actually touching, the head at the correct spot.

Normal safety precautions and the laws relating to firearms must be observed. Other persons should be cleared from the scene, or should stand well behind the operator. High-powered weapons are not necessary for efficient euthanasia and only increase the hazard to people and property.

Rabbits should be killed immediately after they are removed from traps, by breaking their necks. Sudden stretching of the neck ruptures the spinal cord and blood supply to the brain, and is an effective way of killing rabbits. A powerful, decisive action should be used to ensure sudden death.

4.2 NON-TARGET ANIMALS

All reasonable precautions should be taken to minimise the numbers of non-target animals caught in steel-jawed traps. If wildlife is captured accidentally, animals should be humanely handled and, unless seriously injured should be released at the point of capture.

The Guidelines for the Welfare of Wild Animals details the correct ways of handling wildlife and the assistance that should be provided to injured wildlife. The Guidelines include details of contact organisations and outline the roles they can play in nursing injured wildlife back to good health.

Where trapping is conducted in remote locations, and where professional assistance in dealing with injured wildlife is not available readily, captured animals should be examined closely and, if the assessment is that an animal could not survive independently if released, or that it would be subjected to substantial suffering, then it should be killed humanely:

The following guidelines relate to assessment of condition and methods of handling captured wildlife.

4.2.1 Assessment of Condition of Trapped Non-Target Animals

- Remain calm.
- Take time to observe and assess.
- Injured animals are very frightened at being approached or handled and may, in defending themselves, injure handlers.
- A towel, blanket or pullover is useful to subdue a small animal. Drop it over the animal, then wrap it around the animal so that legs or wings and head are secure.
- Some diseases of animals are transmissible to man. Take sensible precautions, especially those of personal hygiene.
- Be gentle when examining the animal, handling may further stress or injure it.
- Be realistic about the extent of the injuries and whether professional expert help is available for the animal.
- Compare the shape of each limb with its pair, are any limbs deformed?
- Run your fingers gently along each limb; are any bones protruding or broken?
- Most animals need all four limbs and birds need both wings but kangaroos may manage if a front limb is impaired; some small birds get by with one leg; disabled animals should not be released into the wild.
- Loss or breakage of feathers may seriously impair a bird's ability to fly.
- A minor wound usually only involves the skin and perhaps some muscle; usually there will be no broken bones. Animals assessed as having minor injuries should be released immediately.
- A serious wound naturally involves the skin, torn muscles and broken bones. Animals assessed as having serious injuries, is the preferred method of euthanasia.

It is important to hit the top, back part of the head very hard, to cause skull fracture, brain damage and death.

Ensure that the skull of the animal is kept still, so that accurate aim can be taken.

Do the job properly. It is better to hit too hard and cause massive injury, than risk death not occurring.

Prepared by the Minister for Agriculture and Rural Affairs.

- Shooting (as detailed in Section 4.1).
- Breaking the neck which is suitable for birds and smaller mammals.
- Skull fracture. Where shooting is not possible, a massive blow to the skull using a heavy instrument, causing extensive brain damage,
