Having this day been present at the examination of the pupils attending the Academy of Mr. Boyd in this town, I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the great and extraordinary proficiency, (considering the time they have been under tuition, respectively.) they evinced in the classics, Algebra and Geometry. It was equally creditable to the master and the scholars, it being quite evident that they had mutually been engaged in a work of the understanding and the judgment: the former in communicating useful instruction in an former in communicating useful instruction in an attractive manner, and the latter in receiving and thoroughly digesting it, and not merely in a profitless exercise of the memory.

Mr Boyd evidently deserves every encouragement from the community; and, I trust, will receive

INCIDENTS AND SCENERY;

The plot of this story is laid in the city of MarPeilles, whither Adolph de Briancourt arrives in gearch of Victorine; between whom the vows of lave had been shortly before exchanged when the youth and his lady love liad nict at a Masquerad in Paris. He discovers in Victorine the daughter of: Cland. Darnaud, a merchant residing in Marpeilles, whose hame had been rendered frightfully notarious by his having procured within a short seilles, whose name had been rendered frustiully notations by his having produced within a short period the execution of seven of his clerks for robbery. Victorine demands from her lover that he enter the services of her father as the only means of uniting them in their ultimate views. With fearful forbodings De Briancourt adopts the task, he is set by the miser his marter to watch, the hoard of gold on the first night of his fervice. Alarmed by robbers he quits his apartment in pursuit, on his reform the chest is found denuned of its treasure. Adolphus is condemned to death.

On the night preceding his execution it is discovered by the watchful Victorine that the
