APPENDIX B: THE STRUCTURE OF THE SYSTEM

The structure of the system is defined by the relationships between the various components. The central node represents the core of the system, while the outer nodes represent the peripheral components. The lines connecting the nodes show the flow of information or the interaction between the components. The structure of the system is determined by the arrangement of the nodes and the connections between them. The diagram shows that the system is highly interconnected, with many nodes and a complex network of lines. This suggests that the system is capable of handling a large amount of information and is able to interact with many different components. The structure of the system is also determined by the nature of the components themselves. Some components are more complex than others, and some are more interconnected than others. The diagram shows that the system is able to handle a wide range of different components, from simple nodes to complex networks. This suggests that the system is highly flexible and is able to adapt to a wide range of different environments.
